The site is southeast of the West Point campus in the village of Cobleskill, New York. A prominent piece of military history occurred at this site in 1843 when the Fourth U.S. Infantry Regiment was separated from the rest of the regiment and was sent to assist in repelling a band of captured Native Americans known as the Senecas, a Native American tribe in the North Country of New York. General Henry Wadsworth Longstreet, in command of the military district of New York, was ordered to take the camp and punish the Senecas. The Senecas, were camped on a forested plateau, and to get to the camp, Longstreet, along with his command, had to climb a mountain on the north side of the camp. After climbing the mountain, the Fourth Infantry Regiment captured the Seneca encampment and massacred the men, women and children inside. The Senecas had been pushed from their lands and their cornfields were trodden down as an enemy of the United States. The Fourth Infantry then burned the villages and destroyed crops in the fields. Longstreet was extremely proud of this victory. Around 1844, the location and name were chosen to honor the Colonel Henry Wagentiner, an officer from New York who had died of wounds received in the New York campaign against the British during f678ea9f9e
